The Role of Clinical Studies for Pets with Naturally Occurring Tumors in Translational Cancer Research National Academies of Sciences, Engineering, and Medicine, Institute of Medicine, Board on Health Care Services, National Cancer Policy Forum, 2016-01-09

Traditional preclinical mouse models of cancer have been very useful for studying the biology of cancer however they often lack key characteristics of human cancers As a result many novel drug candidates fail in human clinical trials despite evidence of drug efficacy in those preclinical models Thus researchers are seeking new approaches to augment preclinical knowledge before undertaking clinical trials for human patients Recently there has been renewed interest in comparative oncology the study of naturally developing cancers in animals as models for human disease as one way to improve cancer drug development and reduce attrition of investigational agents Tumors that spontaneously develop in pet dogs and other companion animals as a result of normal aging share many characteristics with human cancers such as histological appearance tumor genetics biological behavior molecular targets and therapeutic response In June 2015 the Institute of Medicine hosted a workshop to examine the rationale and potential for integrating clinical trials for pet patients with naturally occurring cancers into translational cancer research and development Participants discussed the research needs strategies and resources to support greater integration of clinical trials for pets with cancer into translational research pathways and challenges and potential solutions for facilitating that integration This report summarizes the presentations and discussions from the workshop Science John Michels (Journalist),2008 The British National Bibliography Arthur James Wells,2001 Journal of Experimental Biology ,2006 Cervix Cancer Screening IARC Working Group on the Evaluation of Cancer-Preventive Strategies,International Agency for Research on Cancer,2005 Cervical cancer is still one of the most common forms of cancer among women despite the success of screening for precursors of the disease using the widespread cytological procedure the Papanicolaou or Pap test This volume reviews what is known about the occurrence natural history and causes of cervical cancer before describing the established methods and newer variants and approaches for screening that are now being introduced tested or investigated Based on an international meeting of experts the volume concludes with their evaluation of the evidence on the efficacy of screening for cervical cancer by the various techniques as well as their relative appropriateness depending on the resources available and competing priorities It also provides recommendations for the public health implementation of screening including the frequency of screening and the age groups that should constitute the target population and the identification of areas for further research Readership Public health planners and managers gynaecologists cancer screening personnel Nature Sir Norman Lockyer,2007 Scientific and Educational Programs Rockefeller University,1997 Books in Print ,1952 Medical and Health Information Directory, Vol. 2 Gale,Gale Group,2004-09 Krause.
