

Using Denotations and Connotations

Imagine a news article is written related to the mayor of a local town. The mayor decided to raise taxes. Three stories are written about the mayor's decision. Review the brief passages.

Mayor Smith has boosted the taxes. People all over town are enraged about the massive increase in the tax rate.

Mayor Smith has increased taxes. People all over town are angry about the increase in the tax rate.

Mayor Smith has slightly raised the taxes. People all over town are disappointed about the slight increase in the tax rate.

Which passage is most negative towards the tax increase? Your right, it is the first passage. There are three examples of negative connotations. The second passage is somewhat neutral and reports simply the facts. Finally, the third passage is downplaying the higher taxes- the connotations used are more positive than the first passage.

Nearly all words have positive or favorable and negative or unfavorable connotations that are associated with their neutral denotations. Note the differences between each set of words:

Positive

*relaxed
thrifty
inquisitive*

Neutral

*inactive
conservative curious*

Negative

*lazy
cheap
nosy*

Sometimes, can you rank the following sets of words from positive to negative connotations:

slender, gaunt, skinny, slim, thin bright, clever, brilliant, cunning, smart,

forceful, pushy, domineering, assertive, aggressive attractive, pretty, beautiful, handsome, fair

Finally, it is important to remember- words that have a positive or neutral connotation to one person may be a negative connotation to another person. For example, one person may have no problem with being called old, but another person may feel offended and would rather be referred to as mature or elderly.

Words can hurt, help, or make no difference to another person. In summary, the connotation of the words you write or say is ultimately decided by the reader or listener and not you- but since you are the writer and user of the words, it is important to use words that are concise but also try not to be harmful.

What word or words have you read or heard that may have a negative connotation for you but may not make a difference or have a positive connotation to another person?
