NUMBER & CHARACTER

Integer
 The integer data type represents whole numbers, both positive and negative. It is the most common data type for counting and indexing. The range of values depends on the implementation, but typically ranges from -2,147,483,648 to 2,147,483,647 for a 32-bit signed integer.

Float
 The float data type represents real numbers with a fractional part. It is used for calculations involving decimal values. The range and precision of floats vary by implementation, but they typically range from approximately 1e-38 to 1e38.

Character
 The char data type represents a single character from the character set. It is used for storing and manipulating individual characters, such as letters, digits, and symbols.

String
 A string is a sequence of characters stored in memory. In C++, strings are typically represented as arrays of characters or as objects of the std::string class. They are used for text processing and storage.

Boolean
 The bool data type represents logical values: true and false. It is used for conditional statements and control flow. The values are typically stored as 1 for true and 0 for false.

Complex
 Complex numbers are represented using the complex data type. They consist of a real part and an imaginary part, used in scientific and engineering applications.

Enumerations
 Enumerations (enums) are used to define a set of named constants. They are useful for representing discrete values, such as days of the week or colors. Each enumerator has a unique integer value associated with it.

Operator Precedence
 The order in which operators are evaluated in an expression. The standard order is: parentheses, exponentiation, multiplication and division, addition and subtraction, and finally assignment.

Operator Overloading
 The ability to define custom operators for user-defined data types. This allows for more intuitive and readable code when working with complex objects.
