Introduction

In all the meetings of the EMS- Educational Committee, updated reports are presented by the participants on the current situation related to mathematics education in their countries. Although these reports express the members' personal opinions and do not necessarily reflect national institutional views, they address important issues that provide an initial comparative picture of mathematics education in Europe. The countries that are represented in the reports are Austria, Belgium, Czech Republic, Denmark, England, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Israel, Italy, Portugal, Russia and Spain. In this short paper, the discussion will be around four main aspects that have been addressed in most reports concerning: the overall educational and social matters that have an effect on mathematics education in different educational levels; the curriculum, and the teacher education and professional development. Finally the role of local associations, research groups and national projects is also a factor that seems to influence mathematics education at the levels of both research and practice.

Social and Educational Issues

Financial crisis around Europe, especially in some countries (e.g. Greece, Italy, Portugal, Spain), has resulted in salary cuts in the public sector and a number of educational changes (e.g. merging of schools and universities, reduction of funding, increase of the number of students in the classroom) each of which have had a negative impact in many teachers' motivation. In many countries, for example in France, Denmark, England, Israel and Germany, there is shortage of school mathematics teachers for all or for some levels of educations and in some cases where mathematics teaching is undertaken by out-of-field-teachers, there is the problem of rather low mathematical background even if their engagement is not problematic. In France, another reason that seems to create unwillingness for graduates to choose the teaching profession is the sheer number of challenges: the recent reform requires that they must simultaneously get a Master degree, succeed in the national competition for teacher recruitment, and teach full time in schools, with no professional preparation.
