Abstract– Internet social media services such as Twitter have seen phenomenal growth as millions of users share opinions on different aspects of life every day. This tremendous growth has induced an interest in making use of such data for extracting valuable information, such as their opinions, location of the users and certain other information. In this paper we have analyzed the tweets related to crime attributes against women and children, different sort of crimes that are prevailing, the location in which the users tweets are more frequently occurring related to crimes. The proposed work make use of R language for extracting real time tweets and relies upon Hadoop-based framework for storing the tweets as they are larger in number. The tweets are parsed under Hive environment and we build a sentiment classifier in R that is able to determine positive, negative and neutral sentiments for a given phrase. We observe that the elapse time for processing under Hadoop based framework significantly outperforms the other conventional methods and is more suited for real time streaming tweets.

I. INTRODUCTION

Data has evolved to greater heights and the digital globe is in data deluge due to massive amount of data generated by various sources through business transactions, social networking, mobile communication, search engines etc.. Human and machine generated data is expected to grow exponentially in the era of IoT. Microblogging has become a very popular communication tool among internet users. Few instances of microblogging services like Twitter, Facebook, Tumblr, LinkedIn, Instagram etc., generate more than petabytes of data which stores the views of human in all arenas. In the current data era, large number of internet users tends to migrate from traditional communication tools (such as blogs or mailing lists) to microblogging services because of free format of messages and an easy accessibility of microblogging platforms[1]. Authors of those messages share opinions on variety of topics, express their views on products and services and discuss current issues. Such data can be efficiently used by organizations to improve their business decisions and also believe data will provide with Return of Investment (ROI) when analyzed by providing with deep insights on their own business.

In our paper, we concentrate on the dataset comprised of collected messages from twitter. Twitter contains millions of very short messages (approx. 140 characters) created by the users of microblogging platform. We focus on collecting the messages related to different sorts of abuse against women and children. Table 1 shows typical example of tweets from twitter. As the users of microblogging platforms and services grow every day, millions of tweets (counting nearly to petabytes) started to accumulate which can be effectively used for opinion mining and other sentiment analysis tasks. But the traditional methods, algorithms and frameworks for managing this enormous amount of tweets have become both inadequate for storage and processing.

In this context, big data has emerged as a new paradigm that aims to provide an alternative to traditional solutions in terms of storage and processing. Big data is not just about storage or access to data; its solution aim to analyze data in order to exploit their value[2]. Big data refers to collection of datasets that are terabytes to petabytes in size. The new term coined as “social big data” represents the interaction between social media and big data. Therefore, social big data will be based on the analysis of tremendous amount of data that
