Runtime Monitoring Technique to Detect and Prevent SQL Injection Attacks Ramya Dharam, 2014. The increasing use of web applications to provide reliable online services such as banking shopping etc and to store sensitive user data has made them vulnerable to attacks that target them. In particular SQL injection which allows attackers to gain unauthorized access to the database by injecting specially crafted input strings is one of the most serious threats to web applications. Although researchers and practitioners have proposed various methods to address the SQL injection problem organizations continue to be its victim as attackers are successfully able to circumvent the employed techniques. In this research we develop a Runtime Monitoring Framework to detect and prevent SQL Injection Attacks on web applications. At its core the framework leverages the knowledge gained from pre deployment testing of web applications to identify legal valid execution paths. Monitors are then developed and instrumented to observe the application's behavior and check it for compliance with the valid legal execution paths. Obtained any deviation in the application's behavior is identified as a possible SQL Injection Attack. We conducted an extensive evaluation of the framework by targeting subject applications with a large number of both legitimate and malicious inputs and assessed its ability to detect and prevent SQL Injection Attacks. The framework successfully allowed all the legitimate inputs to access the database without generating any false positives and was able to effectively detect attacks without generating false negative. Moreover the framework imposed a low runtime overhead on the subject applications compared to other techniques.
