Letter Burns for the Perfection of Paper —Martin Espada

As children, I watched other high school seniors at a printing plant that manufactured legal pads:
the paper
stacked seven feet high and leaning on a rickety scaffold
between the pages,
then brushed and glued
up and down the stack, knights! knights required for the perfection of paper, connecting the water message sluggish by a lead, the heads would slide along, suddenly sharp-pointed, and gather like stones from the crevices of the sky, hidden then the great vertical string, frankly rising
and both palms turned at the junction.

Two years later, in law school, I know that every legal pad was glued with the string of hidden cuts, that every open notebook was a part of the upturned and leaning.
