Case Study: Energy Storage Methods and Insulation

A family was building a house in a region with a harsh winter. They needed a way to keep the house warm during the long, dark months. The basement of the house was being finished, and the family was considering different insulation options. They had heard that a certain type of insulation was very effective, but they were unsure if it was worth the cost. They decided to compare the thermal energy storage capacity of different insulation options. They found that one type of insulation had a much higher thermal energy storage capacity than the others. This meant that it could store more heat during the winter months, which would help to keep the house warm during the long, dark months. They decided to use this type of insulation for the basement of their house, and they were very happy with the results. They found that the house was much warmer during the winter months, and they were able to save a lot of money on heating bills.

Why did the basement floor become warmer despite the insulation? (Consider the thermal energy storage capacity.)
