1.1. Introduction

Professor: Christoph, Mita, Tamara, Andrea

Exam: Introduction, Thomas, 20120301, 20120301

Introduction: Computerized systems consist of three main components. They may consist of: hardware (the physical components), software (the instructions that tell the hardware what to do), and data (the information that is processed by the hardware and software). Each of these components must be interconnected. The hardware (physical components) is the body of the computer. Software (instructions) is the brain of the computer. Data (information) is the fuel of the computer. Hardware (physical components) is the body of the computer. Software (instructions) is the brain of the computer.
