6

The real world applications for fuel cells are still in development and require for many reasons cell design that, beyond standard challenges associated with a complex process, address the requirements for development. Fuel cells are made up of an anode and a cathode, and the energy produced is used to drive various systems. Fuel cells are used in many applications, including power generation, and are being developed for use in many other areas, such as in the automotive industry. Fuel cells are expected to be used in many other areas, such as in the automotive industry.

Applying Your Knowledge

Answer the questions below and complete additional responses to the questions below.

1. What are the two main components of a fuel cell? How do they work together to produce energy? The two main components of a fuel cell are the anode and the cathode. The anode is where the oxidation reaction takes place, and the cathode is where the reduction reaction takes place. The two reactions are coupled together, and the overall reaction is the oxidation of the fuel. The energy produced is used to drive various systems. Fuel cells are used in many applications, including power generation, and are being developed for use in many other areas, such as in the automotive industry.

2. How do fuel cells differ from batteries? Fuel cells are different from batteries in that they are not stored energy sources. Fuel cells are used to generate energy on demand, while batteries store energy for later use. Fuel cells are used in many applications, including power generation, and are being developed for use in many other areas, such as in the automotive industry.

3. What are the advantages and disadvantages of fuel cells? Fuel cells have several advantages, including high efficiency, low emissions, and long life. However, they also have some disadvantages, such as high cost and the need for a pure hydrogen supply. Fuel cells are used in many applications, including power generation, and are being developed for use in many other areas, such as in the automotive industry.
