user interactions with products and services during their experiences and maps out significant changes in their experiences. While CJM possesses the advantages of studying customer experiences from their perspectives, it also suffers from limitations such as small sample sizes and biases. This thesis introduces a framework for performing CJM with mobile applications, mobile apps, and analyzing the data collected from the app. The framework was tested on the errand experiences of students, and its findings were compared with those of a parallel study using traditional CJM approaches to demonstrate its effectiveness in performing CJM. The results showed that although existing methods are more suitable for small-scale data collection and identifying apparent user interactions, our proposed approach can better target diverse experiences and reveal latent needs. Overall, mobile applications have the potential to improve CJM and provide valuable insights into customer experiences.
