

Belbin Team Role Theories

By Peter Mackechnie, sourced from a number of articles

Some organisations are quite prescriptive when building teams and will use team role theories to 'build' what they believe is the best performing team for a particular project.

A widely recognised team role theory was suggested by Belbin in 1981. Belbin believes that each of us possesses a pattern of behaviour that characterises one person's behaviour in relationship to another in facilitating the progress of a team.

Dr Meredith Belbin defines a team role as:

"A tendency to behave, contribute and interrelate with others in a particular way."

(Management Teams – Why They Succeed or Fail-Second Edition 2003)

What are the Belbin 'Team Roles'?

Everybody has a tendency to behave in a particular way when working with other people, which doesn't mean, of course, that they'll always behave like that. Meredith Belbin and his colleagues found that that are common clusters of these behaviours, and these clusters are stable enough to be separately identifiable. Everybody seems to have a preference for one or more of these 'Team Roles' when behaving naturally in a group. If you have more than one 'natural role', then you can switch between them if you choose, and this is useful knowledge if you ever need to fill a different role in a team.

The significance is that by observing real teams over a period of several years, Dr Belbin and his group learned how to predict whether a team would succeed or fail, just by knowing the mix of roles within the group. They could also make a failing group succeed by adding somebody with the right-role - or make a successful group fail by taking away a vital supporting role. They also found that if team members identify, share and discuss their team roles then this improves how people work and live together. They refined things as they went along, so some roles have more than one name.
