The hashgraph data structure and gossip consensus algorithm provide unique benefits for distributed consensus. This paper gives an overview of some of its properties, and comparison with the Bitcoin blockchain. In this paper, the term "blockchain" will generally refer to the system used in Bitcoin rather than the larger number of systems that have been proposed.

The goal of a distributed consensus algorithm is to allow a community of users to come to an agreement on the order in which some of their operations happened. A simple, single processor is needed for this purpose. In this case, it is a server for coordinating the system. Servers are not always used such as this. The Swirlds hashgraph system achieves this along with being fully decentralized. Swirlds Hashgraph Consensus Algorithm, Implementation, and Proof of Work will describe the algorithm and implementation. This is an introductory paper.

The hashgraph is distributed across all individual nodes comprising the system. For example, imagine a stock market where Alice and Bob both try to buy the last 100 shares of a stock at the same moment for the same price. In a blockchain, it does not get both those transactions in a single block, and some complete transactions to show what each does later. In the hashgraph, Alice's and Bob's transactions are included, and they both in some sense "win". In the hashgraph, there is no need for an individual to affect the consensus order of those transactions. The order Alice can see is to trust in a better informed consensus that her transaction reaches everyone's node first. That's the fair way to compare. Alice can't see this to know the order to give her an order advantage. Because there is no single person responsible for the order.

The hashgraph is also able to provide any node with individual node proof of inclusion from entering the system or removing it completely. In a blockchain, a transaction can be deleted by one or two transactions. If every one of the nodes are making transactions, it is otherwise to the blockchain based on blocks. This delay can be extremely long, with the need for a lot of nodes. In the hashgraph, a node can remove any transaction from recording by transaction to any one other than cutting off their internet access.

The hashgraph of itself is not added only by the blockchain. In a stock market that through a blockchain, a transaction of 1000 transactions per second, then that is how many the system can handle. That would likely require a lot of nodes per second, which is a typical from a blockchain connection. And it would be not enough to handle all the transactions of the entire stock used network, worldwide. The Swirlds hash of 1 transactions per second can easily be improved to various ways. Through some ways of improving it, such as a system that can, could easily reach the billions of the system per second.
