Economic Behavior and Rationality

In Chapter 1, we defined economic actors as economic agents, as people or organizations engaged in one or the other economic activities: production, distribution, exchange, consumption, and resource allocation. Economic actors can be individuals, small groups (such as a family or a group of entrepreneurs), or large organizations such as a government agency or a multinational corporation. Economists in almost every other activity believe and operate as they engage in economic activities. In this chapter we explore the behavior of individual economic actors—people. We look at contemporary research on their beliefs and actions in economic contexts, compare this with older approaches.

1. Economic Unconsciousness or Mental Mechanisms

Economists have long believed that all people and all acts are cognitively rational or planned and words and actions are well-lying. I believe, all economic behavior is human behavior. Sometimes economists disagree about the nature of human behavior, the validity of rationality, or the degree to which it is well-lying, or why economic outcomes are well described by an abstract framework of human decisions or behavior. The unconscious has traditionally stood on a standing point, more tied to economic ideas for production behind economic actors.

1.1 Classical Economic Views of Mental Processes

In Chapter 2, we reviewed Adam Smith's concept of the invisible hand, according to which people acting in their own self-interest would, through markets, promote the greatest well-being. The concept of the invisible hand has become very famous, and it is often taken out of context to mean that if people only behave with self-interest, they will do what is best for the world economy.

This interpretation would have surprised Smith, who, before writing the famous invisible-hand passage in The Wealth of Nations, had written another long book, The Theory of Moral Sentiments, in which he concerned with how people are motivated. His emphasis there is on the desire of people to have self-interest and the respect of others. He stresses that such respect depends on people acting honorably, justly, and with concern and sympathy for others in their community. Smith recognizes that while desire plays a large role in human behavior, the belief in a high level of the "moral sentiments" (the virtuous desire that will respect and the respect of others) and also by the behaviors are often by which "the many (and) few" will act with one "purpose the public interest."

Thus Smith's version of human nature and human motivation was not to which individual self-interest was mixed with many social motives. Rather than starting with The Wealth of Nations, which David Hume had introduced, he perceived that the behavior of any one person always had to be understood within the person's social context.
