dissertation is divided into three sections First the fundamental principles of nanoscience and the history of microscopy are introduced The second part provides a thorough study of Bardeen s formula and its application in STM The third part describes experimental investigations involving the physicochemical properties of matter at the nanoscale conducted by means of LT STM Studies begin with bare substrate surfaces and successively build in complexity as small molecules solvents nanoclusters and large organic molecules are examined on surfaces Experiments show that carbon monoxide exhibits chemical contrast while oxygen shows a lack thereof Solvents are demonstrated to weaken surface bonds and induce surface atom mass transport and the tip is shown to assist the diffusion Manganese nanoclusters are shown to generate a localized electronic state on graphite by either an electronic or magnetic perturbation The aromatic molecule decacyclene DC is shown to exhibit both bias dependent and tip dependent contrast reversal In addition intermolecular interactions are found to compete with the surface to molecule interactions as dimers are observed on the surface Two geometric orientations of the dimers are proposed to explain dimer characteristics and their relation to substrate dependent properties Lastly DC molecules are examined at coverages in excess of a monolayer and shown to form ordered domains of the boat shape conformation This dissertation emphasizes the local modifications of electronic structures upon physisorption and the interplay between surface to molecule and molecule to molecule interactions which demonstrate the various complexities occurring at the nanoscale
