

Book Publishing in Nigeria: Problems and Prospects

L. O. Nwali

Nigeria shares with other developing countries a variety of problems in providing adequate numbers of high-quality books. Unqualified author-publishers, poor production, inadequate distribution, and lack of capital are all evident. A discussion of the advantages of having a well-developed indigenous publishing industry follows, along with recommendations for establishing and promoting such an industry.

Books play a vital role in individual and national development. E. Cabutey-Adodoaji, the librarian of the Ghana Institute of Management and Public Administration, has written that if developing countries are to progress toward industrialization, they must promote book development and publishing.¹ Although technological developments have led to electronic publishing, the printed book is still the most widely accepted medium for presenting and transmitting knowledge.

Despite the importance of books, there is little book publishing in developing countries. Akhtar Hanif studied the Pakistan National Bibliography from 1976 to 1986 to identify trends in book production in that country. He found poor quality, quantity, and variety in book publishing; lack of literature for the semiliterate and newly literate; and insufficient materials in regional languages.² The situation in Pakistan is not far from that of Nigeria, where problem areas in the book industry include author-publishers, book production, distribution and marketing, and lack of capital.

Problem Areas

Author-Publishers

The inadequacy of indigenous publishing in Nigeria has given rise to author-publishers who produce books of poor quality. "Onitsha Market Literature" is one example of such self-publishing. E.N. Obiochina made an elaborate study of Onitsha Market literature and of the author-publishers of these pamphlets.³ According to him, some of the writers and publishers of Onitsha Mar-
