The New Continentalism: Energy and Twenty-First Century Eurasian Geopolitics. By Kent E. Calder. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2012. 416 pp. $35 (paper).

The massive reserves of hydrocarbons in the Middle East, Central Asia, and Russia along with rapid and continuing growth in China and India provide the impetus for regional cooperation. The declining US role in the region—particularly post-Iraq and Afghanistan—creates the space for a political-economic transformation, one guided by energy relations between Eurasian states. The challenge that Calder grapples with throughout the book is explaining these energy relations as resulting from more than market forces or globalization. Market forces are critical to understanding this growing continentalism, but they are indeterminate, and only tell part of the story about how Eurasia is being transformed.

The missing variable is geopolitics. Put simply, Calder argues that in the post-Cold War world geography is once again preeminent in international relations. Energy reserves in Eurasia are either landlocked or need to pass through narrow straits to reach external mar-
