Transcription factors are proteins that bind to specific DNA sequences in the promoter region of a gene. They then recruit RNA polymerase II to the promoter to start transcription. The process of transcription is regulated by a variety of factors, including transcription factors, enhancers, and silencers. Transcription factors can be classified into two main groups: sequence-specific transcription factors and non-sequence-specific transcription factors. Sequence-specific transcription factors bind to specific DNA sequences and regulate gene expression by recruiting RNA polymerase II to the promoter. Non-sequence-specific transcription factors bind to DNA and regulate gene expression by recruiting RNA polymerase II to the promoter. Transcription factors can be further classified into two main groups: activators and repressors. Activators bind to DNA and recruit RNA polymerase II to the promoter, while repressors bind to DNA and prevent RNA polymerase II from binding to the promoter. Transcription factors can also be classified into two main groups: general transcription factors and specific transcription factors. General transcription factors are involved in the basal transcription machinery, while specific transcription factors are involved in the regulation of gene expression.
