Diffusion Through a Membrane

A Laboratory Activity for the Living Environment

Diffusion is an important living process. It allows the cells of an organism to obtain the raw materials they need to survive. In other organisms, it allows the raw materials for their chemical reactions to get into the organism. In plants, it allows the raw materials for photosynthesis to get into the plant. In animals, it allows the raw materials for cellular respiration to get into the animal. In all these cases, the raw materials are in a higher concentration outside the organism than they are inside. In this activity, you will observe diffusion in action. You will see how a substance moves from a higher concentration to a lower concentration.

When a substance moves from a higher concentration to a lower concentration, it is said to be diffusing. In this activity, you will observe diffusion in action. You will see how a substance moves from a higher concentration to a lower concentration.

Living cells are surrounded by a membrane that is made of phospholipids. These phospholipids are made of two parts: a hydrophilic (water-loving) part and a hydrophobic (water-fearing) part. The hydrophilic part is attracted to water, and the hydrophobic part is repelled by water. This makes the membrane a barrier to the movement of water and other substances. However, some substances can pass through the membrane. The permeability of the membrane can change. Permeability is the ability of a membrane to allow substances to pass through it.

Some parts of the membrane are made of proteins. These proteins are embedded in the membrane. Some proteins are channels that allow substances to pass through. Other proteins are pumps that move substances across the membrane. The permeability of the membrane can change. Permeability is the ability of a membrane to allow substances to pass through it.

Objectives

- 1. To observe the process of diffusion in a living cell.
- 2. To understand how a cell obtains the raw materials it needs to survive.
- 3. To understand how a cell gets rid of the waste products of its metabolism.

Before you begin this activity, you should read the introduction and the background information. You should also read the procedure and the questions. You should also read the conclusion and the evaluation. You should also read the safety information. You should also read the appendix.
