Erik Brynjolfsson,2023 Remote work surged during the Covid pandemic but there is disagreement about the extent of the change To address this question we field a new nationally representative survey the Remote Life Survey RLS We find that in October 2020 31.6 percent of the continuously employed workforce always worked from home WFH and 21.9 percent sometimes or rarely WFH totaling 53.5 percent We compare our results with alternative measurement approaches with a focus on government surveys and provide estimates on the impact of four factors a differences among mail versus web based survey respondents b differences in the inclusion of self employed workers c the industry mix of the sample and d the exclusion of people who were already remote pre pandemic We find that the last explanation d explains the bulk of the difference in estimates between the Current Population Survey CPS and other measures of remote work Policymakers and researchers who turn to the BLS CPS data series for an estimate of remote work prevalence in the American economy should note that it might be underestimating WFH levels by up to 25 percentage points Under our preferred estimates we find that about half of the U S workforce worked remotely at least one day each week as of December 2020
