

Introduction to Decision Theory

Introduction

Mathematical Decision Theory	Psychological Decision Theory
What are the rational/irrational aspects of choice? In what way? Choice Architecture	What are the psychological aspects of choice? How do they differ from the rational/irrational aspects of choice? In what way? Choice Architecture

Mathematical decision theory → attempts to describe the (subjectively) rational process of decision-making by providing a model (using probability theory) for these decisions.

How do these two (mathematical) models differ?

1. Probability representation → probability distributions are continuous and additive
 - attempting to formalize a binary property (A or B) with a
2. Value representation → probability distributions are discrete and additive (but with the latter effect)
3. Non-additivity → probability distributions are not additive in the probability value function (different combinations for a single prospect) → not additive in the probability value function (different combinations)
4. Prospect theory → combines choice values in the loss domain and other (not yet provided) in gains → reference-dependent processes.

→ comparing mathematical models → comparing with/without formal axiomatic approaches

Prospect theory → the model of the utility function (value function)

Prospect theory → Prospect theory is applied to reference-dependent processes.

Prospect Theory (Value Function) Example

- ➔ Prospect theory → the loss or utility in the loss domain is twice as large as the gain in the gain domain (losses are felt more acutely than gains) → losses are felt more acutely than gains (losses are felt more acutely than gains)
- 1. The losses in the domain are additively combined, that is, you can choose between two or three losses simultaneously.
- 2. The losses are multiplicatively combined in prospect theory (losses are felt more acutely than gains).
