(a) Business Cycle

The business cycle is a series of fluctuations in aggregate output, employment, and other macroeconomic variables. The cycle is divided into four phases: expansion, peak, contraction, and trough.

During the expansion phase, aggregate output and employment rise. The economy moves from the trough to the peak. The peak is the point at which aggregate output and employment are at their highest.

During the contraction phase, aggregate output and employment fall. The economy moves from the peak to the trough. The trough is the point at which aggregate output and employment are at their lowest.

The real business cycle model is a model of the business cycle that focuses on the role of technology and capital accumulation.

The real business cycle model is a model of the business cycle that focuses on the role of technology and capital accumulation. The model is based on the following assumptions:

1. The economy is a closed economy with a representative household and a representative firm.

2. The household has a utility function that is increasing and concave in consumption and leisure. The household chooses consumption and leisure to maximize utility.

3. The firm has a production function that is increasing and concave in capital and labor. The firm chooses capital and labor to maximize profit.

4. The economy is in a steady state.

5. The economy is subject to a technology shock.

6. The economy is subject to a capital accumulation shock.
