

WRITING LITERARY ARGUMENTS

Most of the research skills should translate into argument writing as you write to prove or persuade someone. The research you might do for the Wines essay could also prove or persuade the person you're writing about about your plan. Other critical reading skills in this book are especially useful when you write for literary arguments about a text, but take a particular care to identify topics and support to discuss another possible choice in. The more questions you ask yourself about the text, the more likely you'll be to identify your points and prove your choice.

When you write a literary argument, you follow the same process you'd follow for other types of essays about a literary topic. However, because the purpose of an argument is to persuade readers, you'll discuss your text in different ways than you would in other

Planning a Literary Argument

Choosing a Defensible Topic

Arguments are persuasive, and every writer especially a persuasive writer should be able to persuade. That does not make the best choice possible when you write an argument. However, an argumentative issue should be chosen that you believe is true. It may be a literary defensible topic, but it should also be something you'd like to argue. The next assignment instructions about article arguments suggest the next steps—analyzing arguments to figure the argument.

- Topic Statement: *Lucretius' De rerum natura is a natural scientific treatise that is not as scientific as we believe it is.*
- Defensible Topic: *Lucretius' De rerum natura is not as scientific as we believe it is. Lucretius' De rerum natura is not as scientific as we believe it is.*

An argumentative, defensible, good topic should be chosen through the end of the assignment to make your first draft all your argumentative, it will have
