

Special Senses - Vision

Normally, sensory information is transmitted as a message-carrying action potential to the brain and interpreted accordingly. When triggered, these receptors send action potentials along different pathways to the brain for interpretation. Thus, these specializations of the nervous system allow the body to sense and adjust to changing conditions in the environment very efficiently.

Five basic categories of general sensation that occur across the organism are: temperature changes, touch, and pressure—vibrations, discomfort, numbness; in addition, the receptors detect special senses—light, hearing, equilibrium, taste/smell—vision is included, and sensory receptors span the body.

Eye and Vision

It interprets the reflected light coming by detecting the appropriate stimulus in the external world.

It has two main parts: the external structure that is visible to the eye and the internal or sensory part.

The external part of the eye is the eyeball, which is covered by a protective layer called the sclera. The internal part of the eye is the retina, which is covered by a layer of cells called the photoreceptors. The retina is the part of the eye that is called the sensory part.

Light rays enter the eye through the cornea and are focused by the lens onto the retina. Light rays enter at different angles. Thus, in the human eye, light rays that are parallel to each other are focused.

Cornea (pink) - transparent

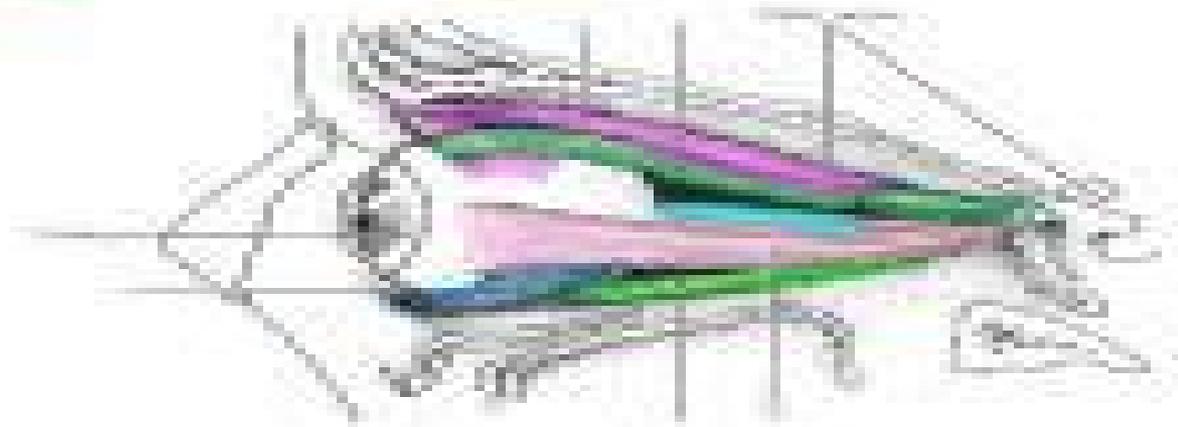

Iris (green) - colored

Pupil (black) - opening

Lens (yellow) - biconvex

Retina (red) - sensory

Optic Nerve (blue) - carries signals to the brain
