

Child's Development: The Case Study

Topic: Psychology | Words: 1149 | Pages: 4

M. is an appropriately developed girl with specific skills and interests that should be discussed. First of all, she has good locomotor skills as she can interact with multiple objects, care for herself, and perform daily activities without any assistance. It can be seen from her behavior and how she copes with everyday tasks. Furthermore, M. is interested in learning and doing complex tasks. She is persistent and tries to resolve challenges on her own. She is also a friendly and polite girl, open with her friends and teachers. She has good learning dispositions as she is ready to ask for assistance in complex cases and listen to instructions.

At the same time, M. is too avoidant for her age as she prefers playing alone in games that do not demand other children's involvement. She is also very independent, which results from the lack of attachment. For this reason, it is possible to offer several ideas to stimulate her learning and development. First of all, parents can spend more time with M., reducing the level of independence she has at the moment. It will help to build stronger relations between a child and her parents and make her more emotional and open.

Another idea is to spend more time playing games with M. Play can be a potent tool to stimulate children's development and address existing issues. Thus, M enjoys creative games, such as building bricks and complex tasks. It means that the parents can start solving puzzles with her. The choice of tasks should be aligned with the current development of a girl. It will stimulate her creativity and cognitive abilities and will be interesting for M. Another idea is trying to engage the girl in playing with
