

CHAPTER X SENTENCE

1. Sentence /clause interface

In the pyramid of syntactic ranks, the structural unit of sentence occupies the utmost position. Its hierarchic supremacy implies that the sentence is realized by/made up of clause/s and that it is a structural unit capable of serving an independent communicative goal¹. Sentence is the rank whereby the valency-based grammatical abstractions realized on the level of clauses are used as units of actual communication. At the sentence rank the arrangement of clause elements is exposed to the principles governing the distribution of communicative dynamism (FSP, see Chapter XXX), and various pragmatic considerations involved in speakers' responses to the extralinguistic factors.²

Sentence may be realized by one or more clauses, and it is delimited by intonation both externally as well as by special intonation arrangement of its internal components. In the English linguistics the term sentence is used to cover both single-clause as well as non-single clause sentences. In Slovak grammars, the two of the types are referred to as jednoduchá veta and súvetie, respectively. The non-single clause sentences may be composed of 2 clauses (which is considered to be the base type), or more than 2 clauses, sometimes also referred to as multiple sentences. The Slovak terminological counterparts are jednoduché súvetie for the former and zložené súvetie for the latter. The English/Slovak terminological discrepancies are summarized in the following chart, along with suggested translation solutions:

² For Dušková the basic sentence-forming syntactic relation is predication and she distinguishes between sentence as abstract linguistic unit (sentence type) and sentence as utterance, i.e. as a concrete communicative unit. (Dušková, 1988: 309). Quark ditto 1985, p.78.47.719 ????????????????
