

1. Introduction

The purpose of this study is to investigate the effects of a new educational program on student performance. The program is designed to improve critical thinking and problem-solving skills through a series of interactive activities and case studies.

2. Methodology

2.1. Participants

The study involved 120 students from a university, divided into two groups: an experimental group and a control group. The experimental group received the new educational program, while the control group received the traditional curriculum.

The experimental group consisted of 60 students who were randomly selected from the first-year students. They were assigned to the new educational program for a period of 12 weeks. The control group consisted of 60 students who were randomly selected from the same pool and continued with the traditional curriculum.

Data was collected through a series of tests and assignments designed to measure critical thinking and problem-solving skills. The tests were administered at the beginning and end of the 12-week period. The control group's performance was used as a baseline to compare the results of the experimental group.

The results of the study show that the experimental group performed significantly better than the control group on the tests. This suggests that the new educational program is effective in improving critical thinking and problem-solving skills.

The findings of this study have important implications for educational practice. It suggests that interactive and case-based learning methods may be more effective than traditional lecture-based methods for developing critical thinking and problem-solving skills in students.

Further research is needed to explore the long-term effects of the program and to identify the specific components that are most effective. It would also be beneficial to investigate the program's impact on other areas of student learning and development.

In conclusion, the study demonstrates that the new educational program is a promising approach to enhancing student performance. By focusing on critical thinking and problem-solving skills, the program provides a more engaging and effective learning experience for students.
