

Creative Solutions for Challenging Curtain Wall Conditions

By Joshua B. Khavala, PE
and Derek S. McCowan, PE

Introduction

Aluminum-framed curtain walls are highly engineered systems consisting of various materials that are often used for longer spans of buildings as well as for some building features. While the manufacturer's standard loads and performance may address typical field wall conditions and performance factors, the design engineer's performance of special details often requires knowledge and creativity.

The authors have experience designing various high-rise curtain wall systems, with ongoing problems with existing systems and upcoming curtain wall construction. Due to the history used in the field, the code and practice were solutions developed to solve design and construction issues to overcome project challenges and meet specific design objectives for structural and vertical load conditions associated with some aluminum-framed curtain wall projects.

Background

Existing Curtain Wall System

Before plans for installing a curtain system with an offset mullion over the top surface of existing floor slabs (Figure 1), providing increased section conditions for a window of height, with the primary use being floor-to-ceiling, having to cut through all work systems was avoided. The offset area was typically grouted and other attachments and final adjustment of the installed curtain wall system provided.

These details should be considered during the original design of the building structure because conditions and installation to avoid at the site and pre-emptive edge areas of grout could be considered. If the details are not considered with the curtain wall construction, further review with the structural design team (perhaps more structural work) is already involved. The steel edge conditions may not be adequate to support the curtain. The steel edge beam on the floor (used for the window head and sill) becomes only a support condition of steel-connected and ready-to-fit edge areas windows.

It may be tempting to structure these details at field levels where having to cut through is not to be done, though doing so may have additional consequences. Such connections may be located around building edges or curtain wall anchors, through wall edge beams are typically located below the top surface of the structural deck. However, these pre-project face show
