

Special Senses - Vision

Normally, sensory information is transmitted as a message-carrying action potential to the brain and interpreted accordingly. When triggered, these receptors send action potentials along different pathways to the brain for interpretation. Thus, these specializations of the nervous system allow the body to sense and adjust to changing conditions in the environment very efficiently.

Five basic categories of general sensation that occur across the organism are: temperature changes, and mechanical—pressure, vibration, touch, etc. In contrast, the receptors for special senses—light, hearing, equilibrium, taste/smell—operate exclusively, and directly, on their own receptors.

Eye and Vision

It captures the light rays (emitted by the object) and focuses them on the retina.

It has two parts: cornea and lens. The cornea is the outer part of the eye and the lens is the inner part.

The cornea is a curved surface that refracts the light rays. The lens is a biconvex structure that refracts the light rays. The light rays are focused on the retina. The retina is a layer of cells that contains the photoreceptors. The photoreceptors are rods and cones. The rods are responsible for vision in low light conditions and the cones are responsible for vision in bright light conditions. The optic nerve carries the visual information from the retina to the brain.

Light rays of different colors are refracted differently by the cornea and lens. This is called dispersion. The different colors are focused at different points on the retina. This is why we see a spectrum of colors when light is dispersed.
