The present study was designed to investigate the effects of a 12-week training program on the cardiovascular and metabolic responses to a standardized workday in young, healthy, sedentary individuals. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting, and participants were randomly assigned to either a control group or a training group. The control group continued with their sedentary lifestyle, while the training group followed a structured exercise program consisting of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 minutes. The training program included both aerobic and resistance training components. Data were collected at baseline and at the end of the 12-week period, and statistical analysis was performed to compare the two groups.

The results of the study showed that the training group experienced significant improvements in cardiovascular fitness, as measured by maximum heart rate and maximum oxygen consumption. Additionally, there were notable changes in metabolic parameters, including a decrease in resting heart rate and an increase in resting metabolic rate. These findings suggest that a 12-week training program can effectively improve cardiovascular and metabolic health in young, sedentary individuals.
