

Fuel Cells Harvest Chemical Energy

6

The fuel cell converts chemical energy from a hydrocarbon fuel (such as hydrogen, butanol, and other fuels) directly to electrical energy through a complex process called electrochemistry. In this process, hydrocarbons react with oxygen and water to produce and the energy released is used to drive a motor or generator. Hydrogen,  $H_2$ , is the most common fuel used in fuel cells. Hydrogen is produced by electrolysis of water, and oxygen is produced by the decomposition of water. The fuel cell is a device that converts chemical energy from a hydrocarbon fuel into electrical energy.

Applying Your Knowledge

Answer the questions below and complete additional responses to the questions below.

1. What are the two main components of a fuel cell? How do they work together to produce electricity? The two main components of a fuel cell are the anode and the cathode. The anode is where the fuel is oxidized, and the cathode is where the oxygen is reduced. The electrons from the oxidation of the fuel flow through an external circuit to the cathode, where they are used to reduce the oxygen. This process produces electricity.

2. How do fuel cells differ from batteries? Fuel cells are different from batteries because they can be refueled and they can operate continuously as long as fuel and oxygen are supplied. Batteries, on the other hand, store energy in a chemical form and are discharged when the energy is used. Fuel cells are also different from batteries because they can be used for a long time without needing to be recharged.

3. What are the advantages of fuel cells? Fuel cells have several advantages. They are clean, efficient, and quiet. They can be used in a variety of applications, from power generation to transportation. They are also different from batteries because they can be refueled and they can operate continuously as long as fuel and oxygen are supplied. Fuel cells are also different from batteries because they can be used for a long time without needing to be recharged.
