

Special Senses - Vision

Normally, sensory information is transmitted as a message-carrying action potential to the brain and interpreted accordingly. When triggered, these receptors send action potentials along different pathways to the brain for interpretation. Thus, these specializations of the nervous system allow the body to sense and adjust to changing conditions in the environment very sensitively.

Five basic categories of general sensation that occur across the organism are: temperature changes, and mechanical—pressure, vibration, touch, etc. In contrast, the receptors for special senses—light, hearing, equilibrium, taste/smell—operate exclusively, and directly, on their own specific receptors.

Eye and Vision

It captures the light rays (emitted by the object) through the eye's optical system to the optic nerve.

It has two main parts: the eyeball (ocular globe) and the accessory eye structures (tear glands, eyelids, etc.).

The anterior segment contains the cornea, which is the eye's outermost part. It is covered by a transparent, protective epithelium. The iris and ciliary muscles are also located in this segment. The iris is a diaphragm that controls the amount of light entering the eye. The ciliary muscles are responsible for changing the shape of the lens to focus on objects at different distances. The posterior segment contains the vitreous body, which is a clear, gelatinous substance that fills the eye. It is bounded by the retina, which is the light-sensitive layer of the eye.

Light rays enter the eye through the cornea and are refracted by the lens. The light rays then pass through the vitreous body and are focused on the retina. The retina is the light-sensitive layer of the eye. It contains photoreceptors that convert light into electrical signals, which are then transmitted to the brain via the optic nerve.

Cornea (transparent) - Refracts light

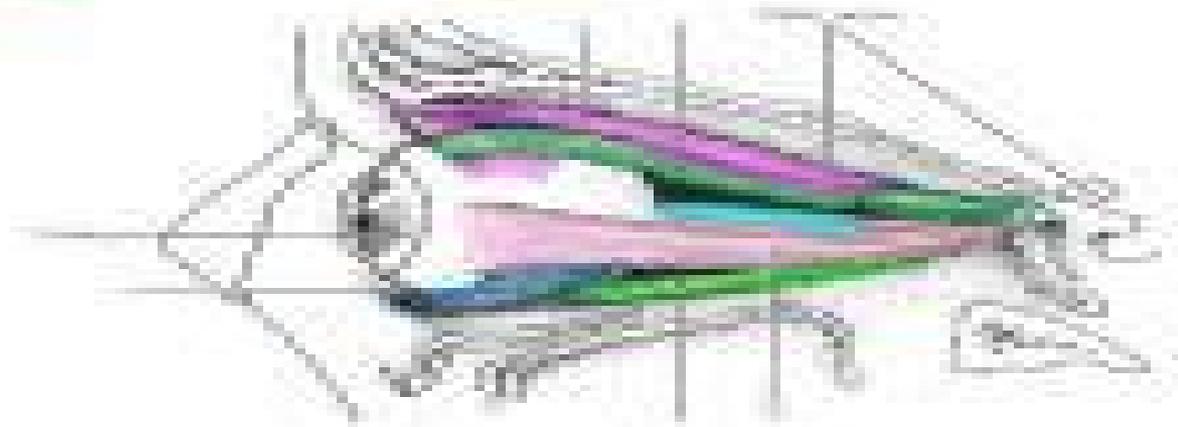

Iris (colored) - Controls light entry

Crystalline lens - Focuses light

Vitreous body - Fills the eye

Retina - Light sensitive

Optic nerve - Carries signals to the brain
