

efficiencies, enhancing economic growth, and creating jobs. Besides the development of knowledge products, some countries relate a knowledge-based economy to higher education and research (Powers & Soutman, 2004). According to the World Bank (2007, 2012), education and training represent one of the four fundamental pillars of a knowledge economy.

Initially, many of the leading countries depend on the traditional resources, such as labor and capital, to create wealth and fuel economic growth. However, with globalization, emerging trends, and technological advancements in the present highly dynamic economic environments, most of them have gradually shifted into the new economy. They emphasize on creating new knowledge and innovation and adopting new technology to drive their progress in economic growth. Basically, they have changed into knowledge-based economies (Cordin, 2000). Knowledge is their greatest asset that places them in the lead, compared to other countries that are still in the transition stage or are lagging behind. Nevertheless, in the past two decades, most of the latter have witnessed the benefits and have been convinced to accept change. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is one of those countries that is enthusiastically transitioning to a knowledge-based economy, especially through university education and research.

Recent international practices, theory, and experience have proven the fact that the contemporary drivers of economic development have changed. More specifically, they ascertain that knowledge is now a key factor in economic growth. Research findings have also enabled researchers to advise that for a country to enhance its national economy's competitive advantage and achieve the benefits that come with the aforementioned developments, economic policies – including science, technology, and industry policies – need to take the different aspects of knowledge into consideration. Such aspects include the new role of technology, innovation, and its utilization in all sectors, education, lifelong learning, entrepreneurship, and sharpening the skills of the workforce.

Countries that have switched into the new economy are reaping the enormous benefits that result from using knowledge to generate both tangible and intangible products and values. A knowledge-based economy gives the economy of a country a forward thrust and places it in a strategic competitive advantage. Furthermore, it results in increased income and revenue. Emerging trends, globalization, and international trade require economies to adapt collectively in order to give in an increasingly competitive world. Thus, countries invest in research and development, and education and training to maximize benefits and maintain a competitive advantage. This means that the basic need for a knowledge-based economy triggers such investments that are key to economic growth.

A knowledge-based economy results in new and increased employment opportunities. This is because it requires a workforce that can run the highly dynamic trends efficiently. People with the required skills thus get jobs in the new high-technology industries and new sectors. Thus, a knowledge-based economy results in investment to develop a highly-skilled labor force (Parmanata, 2004). Research, technological advancement, and a highly skilled workforce translate to productivity gains and, in turn, boost economic growth and development.

A knowledge-based economy also triggers knowledge distribution. This occurs through formal and informal networks and results in increased economic performance. The emergence of new media and social networks has increased the codification of knowledge through computer and communication networks. Skills and tacit knowledge are required to fit in. It is also required in a knowledge-based economy where innovation has changed from the traditional linear model to total interaction between producers and users (Cordin, 2000). Another determinant of economic growth is the national innovation systems that have been configured to encourage interaction among government, academia and industry in development of science and technology. Evidently, knowledge-based economies have triggered, sustained, and accelerated economic growth in both developing and developed countries.

UNIVERSITIES AND KNOWLEDGE ECONOMIES: OPPORTUNITIES AND CHALLENGES

Developing countries face significant new trends in the global environment, such as the increasing importance of knowledge, the main driver of growth within this information and communication revolution. The positive role of higher education sector in building the knowledge-based economy is highly promoted by international organizations such as the World Bank. Investment in quality training and higher education generates major external benefits that are critical for knowledge-driven economic and social development (Kamulya, 2010).
