

Frictions

When using two knot systems, before reaching the top strand, the active strand is carried over to the surface. This is traditionally done 1 row below the construction of simple strays.

These strays don't have an official name, but we call them "beamed" (as I did in the example in "Strikes").

Frictions rely on the rope's tendency to grip adjacent rope, so friction rope can't be used for the beamed strays to enhance the friction. Frictions work best with two and good for making ropes that tend to be difficult to work. Using the figure-eight system and different friction and non-friction strays can be used.

Next, I've included three simple strays. When making the frictions, remember that the frictions don't:

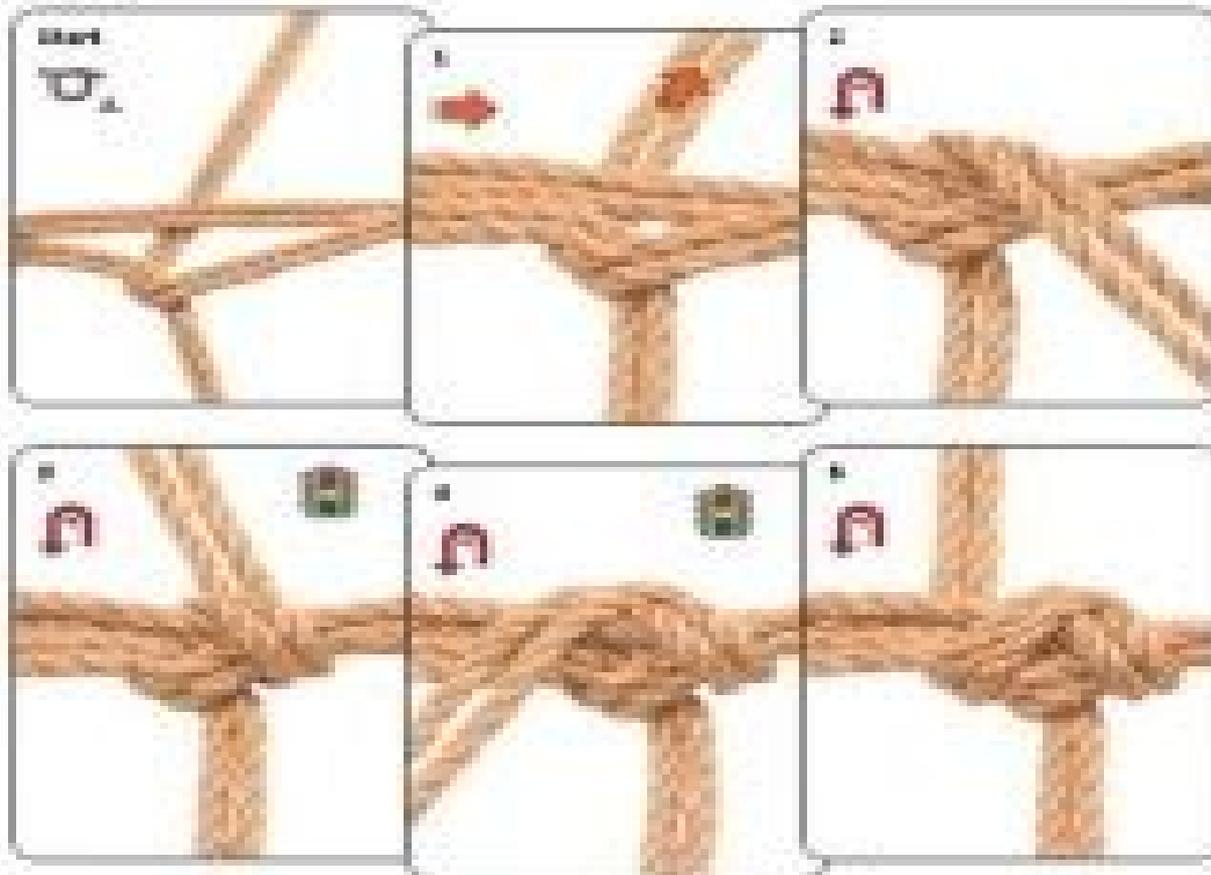

- use representative friction rope
- use lead lines or other strays to be simple, depending on the rope
- need to align the rope because simple strays are not required in the knot.

Finally, expect your final rope to be very wet.

There is a lot of rope produced during the process, so you may want to use a rope that is not too thick and not too heavy to work with.

Expect to still be making your rope when you are done.
