Prior Knowledge Questions (Do these BEFORE using the Gizmo.)

1. What does your teacher tell you about the relationship between the number of atoms of a radioactive substance and the number of half-lives?

1. The number of atoms is halved every half-life.

2. If you have 100 atoms of a radioactive substance, how many atoms will you have after one half-life? After two half-lives? After three half-lives?

2. 50 atoms after one half-life, 25 atoms after two half-lives, 12.5 atoms after three half-lives.

Warm-Up

Like an unopened soda, a radioactive substance has a certain amount of energy stored in its atoms. As the substance decays, it releases energy. This process is called decay. Instead of counting the number of atoms of a substance, you can also measure the amount of energy it releases over time.

The half-life of a substance is the amount of time it takes for half of the substance to decay. The unit of time depends on the substance and is often (but not always) years.

3. What do you think will happen?

3. The number of atoms will decrease over time.

Notes: The following simulation shows how a radioactive substance decays over time. The number of atoms of a substance is shown in the top left corner of the simulation. The number of half-lives is shown in the top right corner.

4. What happens at the end of the first half-life?

4. The number of atoms is halved.

5. In the simulation, look at the beginning, middle, and end of the process.

5. The number of atoms is halved every half-life.
