Entrepreneurial and Human Capital Competences in Organizations Anna Ujwary-Gil, Anna Florek-Paszowska, 2026-01-01 Employer attractiveness in start ups Evidence for the instrumental symbolic framework and the role of protean career orientation Theresa U Zimmer Cornelius J K nig Valentin Hemm Nida ul H Bajwa <https://doi.org/10.7341/20262211> Citation Zimmer T U K nig C J Hemm V those with moderately high levels of both logics were labelled moderate hybridity some with a low level of causation and the lowest level of effectuation were called passive planners and others with a much low level of causation and low level of effectuation were termed as passive effectuators respectively Moderately hybrid entrepreneurs exhibited slightly lower levels of exploration and exploitation compared to actively hybrid entrepreneurs while passive planners and passive effectuators showed significantly lower levels of both activities. Additionally, compared with the sales of actively hybrid entrepreneurs, those of passive effectuators showed a statistically significant lower decline, whereas those of passive planners and moderately hybrid entrepreneurs displayed insignificant differences. Although exploration did not show a statistically significant relationship with sales decline, exploitation did.

IMPLICATIONS This study adds to the causation and effectuation literature from a person-centered approach exploring the association between the different degrees of the composition of decision logics and firm performance. Furthermore, as this research was conducted with decision makers from companies that faced multiple crises in turbulent times, it serves as a guide for entrepreneurs on how to respond to crises with resilience and sustain their businesses.

ORIGINALITY AND VALUE This is the first study to determine the decision profiles of causation and effectuation logics at an individual level in established firms.

Keywords: entrepreneurial decision making, causation logic, effectuation logic, hybrid decision logic, person-centered approach, entrepreneurial decision profiles, knowledge exploration, knowledge exploitation, firm performance, sales decline, crisis context, emerging economy, entrepreneurial resilience, managerial cognition, strategic behavior under uncertainty, K means cluster analysis, structural equation modeling, causation.

Abstract: PURPOSE This study advances prior research by examining how both the organization and its employees contribute to the development of the organization's green image.

METHODOLOGY The present study employed a quantitative approach and conducted a cross-sectional survey in 5-star and 4-star hotels in Oman. In total, 325 of 390 questionnaires were included in the final analysis. The proposed hypotheses were tested using SmartPLS 4.0.

FINDINGS Green talent management (GTM) enhances employees' green commitment, which in turn promotes their pro-environmental behavior (PEB), thereby strengthening the direct and indirect links between GTM and PEB. Employees' PEB improves the organization's green image (OGI) and also mediates the relationship between GTM and OGI. Employees' green commitment and PEB serve as sequential mediators that explain how GTM translates into a stronger OGI.

IMPLICATIONS Organizations can implement practices such as green training and rewards to strengthen their green commitment and foster PEB.

ORIGINALITY AND VALUE The results of this investigation will provide useful insights into the development of strategies and policies to nurture green talent within organizations.

Keywords: green talent management, green commitment, pro-environmental behavior, green image, sustainability, organization
