

Part 1: Background Reading

Ecosystems are constantly changing in response to natural and human disturbances. As an ecosystem changes, older inhabitants gradually die out and new organisms move in, causing further changes in the community. This series of predictable changes that occurs in a community over time is called ecological succession. Ecological succession is slow and gradual; it occurs over a period of many years.

As ecological succession occurs, types of species (both plants and animals) present in a community will change in response to changing environmental conditions. Examples of such environmental conditions include fires, climate change, and human activities, such as clearing forests in order to plant farm fields.

Primary succession

The first species to colonize an ecosystem are called pioneer species. Primary Succession occurs when there is no soil at all, such as after a volcanic eruption or extreme human impact. Since there is no soil, the Pioneer species such as lichens (a fungus + algae), mosses, and bacteria help break up bare rock and form a base of soil that can be used by plants. As environmental conditions change, the pioneers are replaced by early successional species such as herbs, grasses, wild flowers, and low shrubs.

Over time, this second set of species is replaced by yet another set of species. As time goes on, larger trees begin to grow in the environment and “shade out” the grasses and herbs.

As each plant community changes, so do the animal communities. Animal species have adaptations that make them best suited for particular environments and habitats. The plants that are found in a given habitat will determine which animals can live there.
