1. Which characteristic of early industrial societies was not characteristic of agricultural societies?

Answers: Industrial societies were more dependent on the division of labor than agricultural societies. During the early industrial period, the division of labor was more pronounced, and the concentration of workers in factories and mills led to a more specialized workforce. In contrast, agricultural societies were more dependent on the land and the family unit for labor. The division of labor in agriculture was less pronounced, and workers were more likely to be self-sufficient and produce their own goods. The concentration of workers in factories and mills led to a more specialized workforce, which was a characteristic of industrial societies.
