MICROSOFT POWER APPS TECH MORIS, 2026-02-19 The significance of low code development in modern organizations cannot be overstated. Businesses are grappling with an explosion of data, the need for seamless automation, and the demand for custom tools that address specific operational pain points. According to industry analyses, by 2026 a substantial majority of new enterprise applications are projected to incorporate low code elements, driven by the need to accelerate delivery times and reduce development expenses significantly. Low code platforms enable faster time to market, often cutting development cycles from months to weeks or even days. They also lower barriers to entry, empowering business users such as analysts, managers, and domain experts to prototype and deploy solutions without relying solely on IT departments. This shift fosters greater agility, reduces shadow IT risks, where unauthorized tools proliferate, and bridges the gap between business needs and technical execution.
