

WRITING LITERARY ARGUMENTS

Most of the research writing about literature you encounter in school is persuasive in genre and purpose. Sometimes, that research can help determine the focus of your writing. Other times, it will give you evidence for your own ideas about literature. Often, it'll be the student's choice to do both: use research to develop your own ideas for literary arguments about a text, or take a position and defend it with research to clarify readers' possible objections. The more persuasive your argumentative essay becomes, the more likely readers will be convinced your position and your own voice is right.

When you write a literary argument, you follow the same process you'd follow for other persuasive essays about a literary topic. However, because the purpose of an argument is to convince readers, you'll focus more on addressing questions to persuade your reader.

Planning a Literary Argument

Choosing a Defensible Topic

Arguments are persuasive only when you argue a specific, arguable position about a text or author. That text may not be the literary text itself, but you will write about literary or authorial choices made, or about the way readers think about literary or authorial choices. You can choose what to argue about, but you must choose a defensible topic. You should also choose a position you can defend. The next two sections—Formulating a Defensible Position and Formulating a Position—provide suggestions to help you choose.

- Formulating a Defensible Position: Choose a position. It should be arguable, interesting, and not too obvious. For example, you might argue that Hamlet is a tragedy.
- Formulating a Position: Select a text or author to argue about. You can choose a text or author you know well, or you can choose a text or author you're interested in learning more about.

An author's writing, including your topic, should be interesting enough that you'll be motivated to write your paper. You'll also want to choose a topic that you'll have
