

CHAPTER 5

GENERAL ECONOMICS

In any well-organized society, the production of goods and services is the result of the efforts of many individuals. Each individual has a certain amount of resources at his disposal, and he must use these resources in some way to produce goods and services. The total amount of resources available to a society is limited, and the total amount of goods and services that can be produced is also limited.

However, not every individual has the same amount of resources. Some individuals are more skilled than others, and some have more time available than others. These differences in resources and abilities lead to differences in the amount of goods and services that individuals can produce. This is the basis of the division of labor, which is a key feature of any well-organized society.

There are two main reasons why individuals specialize in the production of goods and services. First, specialization allows individuals to become more efficient in their work. Second, specialization allows individuals to produce a wider variety of goods and services than they could produce on their own.

Specialization also leads to the development of a market system. In a market system, individuals buy and sell goods and services from one another. This system allows individuals to specialize in the production of goods and services, and it allows them to trade their products for the goods and services that they need. The market system is a key feature of any well-organized society.

There are two main reasons why individuals specialize in the production of goods and services. First, specialization allows individuals to become more efficient in their work. Second, specialization allows individuals to produce a wider variety of goods and services than they could produce on their own. This is the basis of the division of labor, which is a key feature of any well-organized society.
