Abstract

In this paper we are going to discuss about the vital role of cloud computing in the field of telemedicine. Cloud computing has had, and will continue to have, a revolutionary effect on telemedicine. In particular we describe how Cloud Computing is the key to user determined goals. In fact, the medical professionals are already using cloud computing in its most basic form effectively. This paper gives a brief explanation of application of Cloud Computing in patient's data collection, its history, characteristics and working as well. We explain the benefits of cloud-based video conferencing which is a cost-effective service. Also this paper explains the improvements of Cloud computing in patient's admission, scheduling and monitoring. Thus we are going to propose the cost effective application of cloud computing in this paper. Finally we summaries the argument with the advances in computer speed and processing power, better software and new hardware will seamlessly integrate the two forever. Thus we are going to propose the cost effective application of cloud computing in this paper.

I. INTRODUCTION

Cloudcomputing'in the field of Telemedicine[2] can provide significant economies of scale, through efficiencies gained in power management and allocation of fixed IT assets. Improvements in security and availability can be realized through the use of managed hosting providers with effective plans for failover and network and infrastructure redundancy. Business agility is supported through on-demand, elastic, and pay-as-you-go cloud services. These are all recognized as traditional business drivers for cloud computing, yet what are the drivers specific to healthcare? Let's take a look.

A. A Cloud Computing Solution for Patient's Data Collection in Health Care Institutions

Telemedicine allows remote diagnoses and monitoring of patients [1]. It guarantees agility, safety, and reliability in modern healthcare institutions. There are several challenges associated to automation in this sort of environment [2]. Heterogeneity of devices, protocols, and programming interfaces, the requirement for flexible, impact free deployment, the requirement for easy to configure, easy to manage, scalable and, if possible, self-adjusting systems, and others. Sensors are attached to existing medical equipment's that are inter-connected to exchange services; these are integrated to the institution's computing network infrastructure. The information becomes available in the cloud, from where it can be processed by expert systems and distributed to medical staff for analysis. In order to avoid latency during data gathering and information accessibility we have designed service provisioning model that provides adaptive, flexible and simple access to computing resources, enabling a pay-per-use model for computing similar to traditional utilities such as water or electricity.

This model provides inherent support to ideas of outsourcing and on-demand availability of resources, which is desirable for creating composed services in dynamic environments. To provide support to existent sensors in environment we considered aspects of wireless sensor networks (WSN) [3] [4]. Wireless networks facilitate the collection and distribution of information to and from mobile devices. The structure created by wireless sensor nodes is flexible, low cost and can leverage the combination of local sensors to collect data with remote processing power to analyze and deploy information as a utility computing. This setup allows the deployment of dynamic and collaborative applications. This technology provides the solution to Interconnect heterogeneous devices over an open area and without wired structures. This service acts like a door, were medical staff devices can access all available information. There are several practical advantages in this implementation, such as:
- It provides always-on, real-time data collecting
- It eliminates manual collecting work and possibility of typing errors; and
- It facilitated the deployment process, as wireless networking means no need for cabling or other physical setup. The proposed architecture covers the several elements in current systems, such as:
  - Sensors attached to legacy medical devices replace the necessity of (i) manual data gathering and (ii) data entering on medical system.
  - Computer resources available in the cloud are responsible to (i) organize, index, and make the data accessible, and; distribute the data to (ii) medical staff.

The figure which is given below explains working of patient's data entry in Health Care Institutions.
