

1. Introduction

The purpose of this study is to investigate the effects of a new educational program on student performance. The program is designed to improve critical thinking and problem-solving skills through a series of interactive activities and case studies.

2. Methodology

2.1 Participants

The study involved 120 students from a university, divided into two groups: an experimental group and a control group.

The experimental group consisted of 60 students who participated in the new educational program. The control group consisted of 60 students who followed the traditional curriculum. Both groups were matched for age, gender, and prior academic performance.

Data was collected through standardized tests and surveys. The tests measured critical thinking and problem-solving skills, while the surveys assessed student engagement and satisfaction. Data analysis was conducted using statistical software to compare the results of the two groups.

The results of the study show that the experimental group performed significantly better than the control group on the critical thinking and problem-solving tests. This suggests that the new educational program is effective in improving these skills.

Furthermore, the surveys indicated that students in the experimental group were more engaged and satisfied with their learning experience. This suggests that the program is not only effective in improving skills but also in enhancing the overall learning experience.

The findings of this study have important implications for educational practice. They suggest that interactive and case-based learning methods can be used to improve student performance in critical thinking and problem-solving.

Future research should explore the long-term effects of the program and its applicability to other subjects and educational settings. Additionally, further research is needed to identify the specific components of the program that are most effective in improving student performance.
