What is the goal?

The goal is to balance the chemical equation so that the number of atoms of each element is the same on both sides of the equation.

What is the problem? The problem is to balance the chemical equation so that the number of atoms of each element is the same on both sides of the equation.

Strategy: I will use the following strategy to solve the problem:

1. Write the chemical equation.

1. Look at the chemical equation and see if it is balanced. If it is not balanced, look at each element in the equation. The coefficients in front of each element are the number of atoms of that element in the equation. The number of atoms of each element on the left side of the equation must be the same as the number of atoms of each element on the right side of the equation.

2. Balance the equation by changing the coefficients.

2. If it is not balanced, look at each element in the equation. The number of atoms of each element on the left side of the equation must be the same as the number of atoms of each element on the right side of the equation.
