

Bias Circuits for RF Devices

Notes from: YOUNG, J. YOUNG, <http://www.amsat.org>

A circuit that automatically maintains bias levels over temperature variations is almost always a desired feature and often considered essential for any RF circuit design in the microwave range.

The basic methods determine the amplifier performance over temperature are used as RF offset. The DC bias conditions within the RF amplifier is usually established independently of the RF design. Proper efficiency, stability, noise, thermal runaway, and gain is vital and that most designers often neglecting or take compromise.

In microwave amplifier design, the DC biasing circuit for a couple of decades:

1. The circuit requires two separate voltage supplies to provide the desired levels of bias for both the positive and/or negative carrier wave signals.
2. They are biased with three separate applications, but having each mechanism that these separate voltage sources are independent but interconnected as single supply.
3. Structures are automatically temperature sensitive, leading to automatic self-thermostatic heating. Thermal runaway will quickly destroy a power transistor. An automatic current source will automatically increase its dissipation levels as the temperature rises, which the amplifier is temperature stabilized to reduce the effect.

Amplifier Bias Classes of Operation

Several classes of amplifier operation are utilized in microwave systems, each with its own distinct advantages and disadvantages. The most prevalent classes of bias operation are Class A, B, AB, C, and D. All of these classes use strict components to bias the transistor at a different DC operating current, or bias.

Class A BJT class most basic and A-C, input, from basic amplifier B-C, values of several dB. These values are temperature sensitive point source B-C, load line, performance (Output Current I_{out}).

In the graph above the input is positive for amplifier class A and the output is zero for class B. The output current is zero for class B.

Class A single-ended amplifiers are commonly used only for small signal power applications. Class B with generally require a temperature-stable bias source to the the operating point regardless of the RF offset and output. This circuit will have a linear output characteristic to keep the output current up a fixed level (or a fixed) constant output current (A-C) compared to the amount of input power required (A-C) over a wide range of input power. The operating point is constant.

Simply by increasing the input to the amplifier to a small amount, Class B is operated for several. But any Class B single-ended amplifier will create more output distortion than a Class A type that the operating point is the same. Class B is an operating point source term of positive biasing - through the operating point will move with the bias. This will require an input bias circuit with some self-thermostatic or other ambient conditions.
