Insulin is made with type 1 diabetes, the pancreas no longer makes insulin. Biochemists have been able to produce a small insulin molecule and give it to people with type 1 diabetes. However, insulin has a short shelf life and is hard to produce. One way to make insulin is to use a bacterium like E. coli. The insulin gene is inserted into the bacterium and the bacterium produces insulin. The insulin is then purified and used to treat people with type 1 diabetes. The insulin is made in the bacterium's cytoplasm. The energy for the bacterium is provided by the bacterium's own metabolic processes. The bacterium is grown in a large fermenter. Bacteria do not use very many different amino acids, they produce most of their own. However, we can genetically engineer bacteria to produce very specific proteins. In the pancreas, a bacterium that carries the insulin gene will produce insulin and then secrete it into the blood. The bacterium will be genetically engineered to produce insulin.
