

Privacy Protection Online in Real-World Examples

Topic: Tech & Engineering | Words: 1440 | Pages: 5

Websites must take privacy seriously in order to keep their users safe. It is imperative that they include some form of privacy protection to guarantee their customers' confidentiality (Lin, 2018). Confidentiality is vital as it helps to build customer confidence in the company, thus boosting loyalty. Various popular websites will be evaluated based on privacy protection criteria. This paper will discuss five websites: Wells Fargo's online banking service, Gmail, eBay, Google, and Amazon.

The most common method of protecting an individual's personal information online is by using a login and password. Each user has the option of creating a unique username and password. Users must use unique usernames each time they log in, and the identification and authentication methods must be valid. If a user cannot remember their login credentials, a personal security question is used to confirm their identity. In the absence of this security question, anyone may just click "Forgot my password" and acquire a new password to log in (Lin, 2018). An unrestricted user cannot decipher a website's encrypted data. Hence, logarithms must be utilized to protect the data and storage. A firewall is a helpful piece of hardware that keeps unauthorized people out.

Websites that place a high emphasis on privacy must provide appropriate access to confidential information in order to allow for examination and rectification. As a result, a website must take all reasonable steps to safeguard sensitive information collected in the course of doing profiling on users' browsing habits (Lin, 2018). When it
