"The Temperance and Prohibition Question in America"

By David Mervin Long

This passage by Longfellow was an important factor in the American Prohibitionist Plan. When John Pierpont's temperance act of 1835 was introduced at age 23, Longfellow was left with a great impression and resolution. He only 20 years old, but possessed a great ability following on the knowledge of his family's progressive military history. Two years later, he supported his uncle and his six friends including many of those famous names: Thomas St. Maurice, a relative of the King.

Over 200, despite his youth and high standing in America's history, Longfellow was not present. During a day in Paris, he learned of the American soldiers' march against the British. He began to attend and participate in meetings for various (political) activities with other professionals who sympathized with the soldiers and their quest of independence. He was also inspired by the French, William Long, whose first work spent freely about the ideas of revolution and setting up a Republic.

In these meetings, European intellectuals, scientists and philosophers discussed the rights of man, the abolition of slavery, and the principles of the American movement, emphasizing the importance of equality and liberty. These principles were heavily influenced by the Enlightenment's progressivism, movement, a free individualism, the American Revolution, and the Enlightenment's humanism, natural history, metaphysics, and individualism. They challenged ideas rooted in tradition and religion, such as superstitions, unexamined faith, and rituals. Instead they suggested religion through individual study and practical method. Among their philosophies was the idea that citizens should be provided equality and individual freedom.

In America, Progress was a movement, which means a change in government, society,
