

Chapter 4: Algebraic Structures

Algebraic structures are mathematical systems consisting of a set of elements and one or more binary operations defined on that set. The most common examples are groups, rings, and fields. This chapter explores the properties and relationships between these structures.

Groups and Subgroups

A group is a set G equipped with a binary operation \cdot that satisfies the following properties: closure, associativity, identity, and invertibility. A subset H of G is a subgroup if it is closed under the operation and contains the identity and inverses of its elements.

Every group has a unique identity element and a unique inverse for each element. The identity element is denoted by e , and the inverse of an element a is denoted by a^{-1} .

Groups are fundamental in many areas of mathematics, including geometry, physics, and cryptography. They provide a framework for understanding symmetry and the structure of mathematical objects.

The study of groups leads to the concept of a quotient group, which is formed by partitioning a group into cosets of a normal subgroup.
