Explanatory notes on multi-phase technology

Multi-phase dispersions are comprising polymer particles, each composed of at least two different polymers – the two polymers for example are generally made with at least two different Tg levels (one soft / one hard). The soft phase of those multi-phase emulsions will generally form a film at room temperature and act as the "film former".

Controlled Particle- and Film-Morphology:

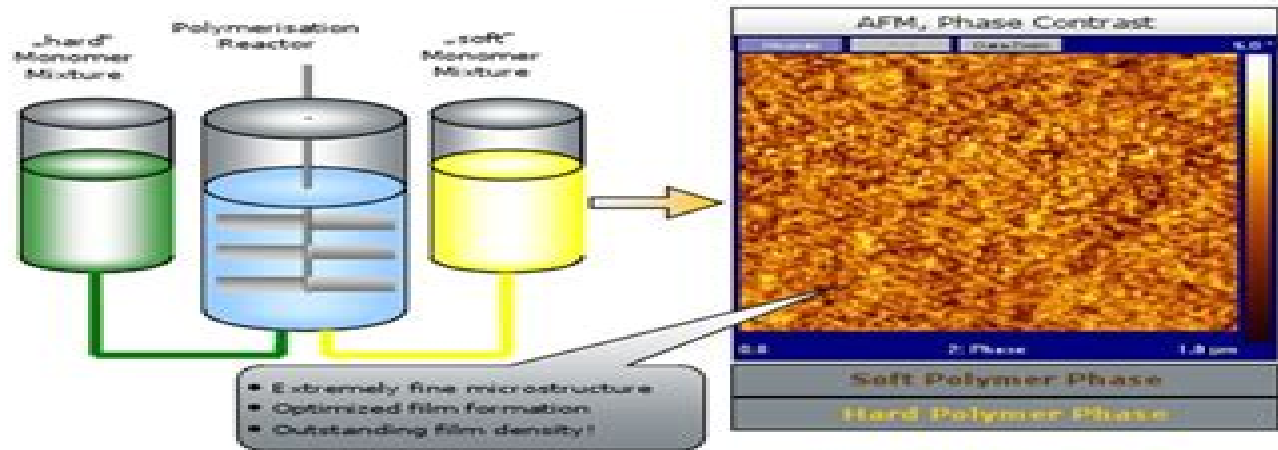

Fig. 1: Polymerisation 2-phase Binder

The hard polymer phase will usually not form a film at room temperature or even at elevated temperatures – this is due to Tg's higher than 50°C. The reason for designing this high Tg material is that it will act as a non-sticking "spacer" to provide block resistance as well as increasing mechanical and chemical resistance.
